In 1967, a small team of Special Forces soldiers was sent to Bolivia to help capture Che Guevara, the world's most famous revolutionary. Guevara was a Marxist who had fought in the Cuban Revolution and was now leading a rebellion in Bolivia. The Bolivian government had asked for help from the United States, and the Special Forces team was sent to provide that help.

The team was led by Captain Gary Prado, a Bolivian Special Forces officer. Prado had been trained by the United States and was considered one of the best Special Forces officers in the world. The team also included several American Special Forces soldiers, as well as a number of Bolivian soldiers.

The team's mission was to find and capture Guevara, but this was no easy task. Guevara was a skilled guerrilla fighter and he had a lot of support from the local population. The team also had to deal with the difficult terrain of the Bolivian jungle.

Despite the challenges, the team was able to track down Guevara and his guerrillas. On October 8, 1967, the team surrounded Guevara's camp and captured him. Guevara was taken to a nearby village, where he was interrogated and executed.

The capture of Guevara was a major victory for the Bolivian government and the United States. It was also a major blow to the communist movement in Latin America.
